Should you hold the elevator if someone reaches the door?

If you're standing near the buttons, offer to press the floor someone wants when they get on. You should hold the elevator for someone approaching the doors if there's plenty of space inside. However, don't do so if the elevator is full.

Should you stay out of the elevator if you're going up or down?

This rule insists you stay out of the elevator if you're going fewer than two floors up or down. Why? You may get some dirty looks from colleagues and fellow passengers if you're adding an extra 20 seconds to their commute or if they have to stop at every other floor.

How do you avoid inconvenience in a car elevator?

This way you will avoid inconveniencing others. If you happen to be riding in the front, make sure to step off the elevator when the doors open on each floor. When in this position, hold the elevator with your hand as the people from the back of the elevator make their way out.

Should you avoid an elevator?

There's no need to avoid an elevator when you are aware of these simple rules: No one wants to climb 20 flights of stairs when they could take a quick and easy elevator trip. DO: Exit the elevator quickly to make room for the passengers waiting to board.

How do you stop a passenger from exiting the elevator?

Don't block the only exit for the passengers inside. DO: Stand to the right of the elevator doors. This will clear a path for the passengers waiting to exit on your floor. DON'T: Rush the elevator doors.

Should you press a floor button on an elevator?

Most people, even most children, know you should never just press a bunch of buttons for floors that you don't need. That causes the elevator to stop on every floor, delaying the trip for all passengers. But you should also use common elevator etiquette when dealing with floor buttons.
