Should you choose your own energy supplier in Germany?

While this ensures you an uninterrupted supply of electricity and gas, it rarely offers you good value for money. It, therefore, makes good financial sense to choose your own energy supplier. Most people in Germany pay their electricity and gas bills via a monthly direct debit to their energy company.

How does Germany's energy transition affect power companies?

Germany's energy transition has shaken the country's dominant power companies to the core, because it undermines their traditional business model of centralised power generation. In a bid to survive the turmoil, the utilities scramble for new business models. This factsheet provides an overview of the companies' key data.

Why are consumers turning away from private energy companies in Germany?

Gradually, however, consumers in Germany have begun to turn away from private energy companies. In many areas, such as Hamburg and Munich, power grids are being returned to public control. With less of an emphasis on profit, these municipal utilities tend to offer more stable rates and invest more in green technology.
